'Prepare your VIP ribbon-cutting ceremony, the LEGO® Natural History Museum is officially ready to open! And it's big enough to house the entire skeleton of an enormous Brachiosaurus. (Or perhaps its lesser-known relative, the Brickiosaurus?) Join a cast of dedicated staff and enthusiastic museum visitors as you curate inspiring exhibits, discover new building techniques and journey through the Mesozoic era to the future of space travel. And, as any respectable museum would do, we have dug through our own LEGO history and uncovered precious and fun artifacts to exhibit throughout this modular set.'

CHRIS MCVEIGH

Designer of the 10326 Natural History Museum

EXPLORE THE COLLECTIONS

Enter the museum and you'll be greeted in the gift shop, which features interesting pamphlets about the collections and exhibits and, of course, assorted memorabilia and souvenirs. We start our tour on the ground floor, where we peruse the natural history exhibit, with important finds from delicate pottery and fossils to rocks and the magnificent Brachiosaurus. Travelling up to the first floor, we journey through our own past and peek into the future of space exploration. Please note that only museum staff have access to the rooftop area, but if you ask the curator nicely, he may extend your tour to his office. Enjoy your day and feel free to extend your stay!

Someone call security! A curious puppy is sneaking a bone through the back door! A vigilant museum employee is right on his heels and makes sure the bone is returned to the curator.

The sabre-toothed tiger skull is another prized artifact in the natural history collection. Did you know that their oversized canine teeth could measure up to 20 cm (7.8 in.) long?

81

Yes, this is, in fact, dino poo. Fossilised dinosaur waste (coprolite) can actually tell us a lot about a species' diet. The Brachiosaurus, for example, was strictly vegetarian.

Which came first, the dinosaur or the egg? All we know is that every known species of dinosaur is believed to have reproduced by laying eggs.

Volcanoes are typically found over mantle plumes and meeting points of tectonic plates. Don't worry, this model of an active volcano is completely safe to explore.

This part of the natural history collection really rocks. These types of quartz, geodes and stalagmites have been collected from all over the world.
